Redolent of spices, covered in candy and treats, brought to life in the story of Hansel Gretel, gingerbread houses make for glorious holiday decorations and provide an activity that the whole family can be involved in. Making Gingerbread Houses: Storey Country Wisdom Bulletin A-154 (Storey Publishing Bulletin, a-154), a short pamphlet authored by Rhonda Massingham Hart, contains excellent directions tips outlining every step of Gingerbread House construction and provides those all-important blueprints for several different buildings, including Starter Home Country Chapel Victorian House Old Time Store Log Cabin Castle Barn Silo 3D Christmas Tree Also included - a recipe for a good basic gingerbread suitable for construction, recipes and instructions for Royal Icing*, Almost Buttercream Frosting, Fondant for modeling along with directions for making your own piping bags from parchment paper and lots of decorating ideas.*Rhonda gives the recipe for Royal Icing using egg whites and notes that it is not safe to eat. Most decorators these days use Meringue Powder to eliminate any safety issues that might arise from uncooked egg whites. Royal Icing made with Meringue powder is edible. It is available both here at and in the Cake Decorating/Crafts section of your local big box store. Grandma's Favorite - If you have leftover Royal Icing, tint it several different colors if it isn't already, then pipe it out in small blobs on long strips of paper to make old fashioned Candy Dots! Grandm's $0.02 - Building a Gingerbread House is almost as much fun as eating one, though they can be kept from year to year. Spread the work over several days - bake the pieces one day, do the preliminary frosting and decorating on the individual pieces the next. Put it all together on Day 3.
